Strategies for Teaching Multilingual Learners Series
PART 1: Who are Multilingual Learners?

UC Davis is a linguistically diverse campus, with much of its student population being bi or multilingual. According to UC Davis Admissions, of the undergraduate students admitted in 2016-2017, about 41% spoke only English at home, 27% spoke English and another language, and 33% spoke only another language at home. This resource will provide some information on the complex linguistic and cultural backgrounds of multilingual learners, and offer a number of specific strategies and suggestions for supporting these students in the classroom.

Who are multilingual students?
Multilingual students come from a variety of backgrounds in terms of language, culture, immigration or visa status, and time spent in the US. The majority of international students are bi or multilingual, with some having taken English classes throughout their schooling, while others attended international high schools where English was the primary language. Others may be refugee students (or those with similar backgrounds), who may have limited or interrupted literacy development in both their home languages and English (Menken, 2013). Another group common in California are long-term permanent residents and the children of immigrants who arrived when they were young children. Often identified as Generation 1.5, these students primarily grew up learning English in the US school system (Menken, 2013).

Challenges multilingual students may face in the classroom
Given their varied backgrounds, it is important to recognize that multilingual students may differ quite a bit from each other in the challenges they face in the classroom. Here are a few general examples of the challenges faced by multilingual students, and some suggestions on what you can do to help support them:

<td>May be proficient in some modalities of English, but not others.</td>
<td>Multilingual students may differ in their proficiencies with English, or with certain modalities of English (i.e., writing, reading, listening, or speaking). For example, international students may be proficient in writing or reading in English, but may struggle considerably with their listening or speaking skills. In contrast, Generation 1.5 students may sound verbally indistinguishable from native English speakers, but may struggle with reading or writing in academic contexts (Menken, 2013).</td>
<td>Consider employing a variety of modes when lecturing, and when designing activities. For example, Freedman (n.d.) notes that all students, not just multilingual ones, can benefit from the inclusion of visuals (e.g., PowerPoints, Prezis, writing key concepts on the board, etc.) with your lecture. Encourage students to read ahead so that vocabulary is present and activated during class, and highlight assignments that require more reading/writing so that students can plan accordingly.</td>

<td>May experience a high amount of cognitive load.</td>
<td>Multilingual students may experience a high amount of cognitive load as they attempt to learn complex content in your class in a language they are still in the process of acquiring.</td>
<td>Sweller (2017) suggests clearly defining and explaining key course concepts in class, instead of expecting students to induce the information themselves from readings. Accompany these explanations with visuals that help students understand complex terms or ideas. For additional suggestions on teaching to reduce cognitive load, see Crosby (2015).</td>

May feel uncomfortable participating in class discussions or activities

Multilingual students, especially those who struggle with their speaking and listening skills, or those who come from cultures that don’t encourage discussion in class, may feel uncomfortable or anxious about speaking during class discussions.

Some of the anxiety surrounding speaking in class may be alleviated by first having students discuss in smaller groups. Have students get into groups of 2-6 people, and ask them to select one person to report their ideas to the class. You can also employ think, pair, share activities, which will give multilingual students time to think through their response in writing first.

May have difficulties completing or understanding course readings

Multilingual students may struggle to get through lengthy readings, especially when those readings use complex academic language and/or jargon.

Students may benefit from a quick overview of the main ideas, structures, and language in a reading. It may also be helpful to discuss effective reading strategies with students. Consider assigning Karen Rosenberg’s “Reading Games” at the beginning of the term. This article, written for college students, provides strategies for tackling complex texts quickly.

May submit writing with consistent grammar or syntax errors

Writing from multilingual students often displays consistent errors or patterns of error (particularly with articles and/or prepositions) that can distract from the writing’s content, and in some cases, its intelligibility. These students are often anxious about their writing, and may ask you specifically about their grammar.

Before grading the paper, consider the impact these errors have on the student’s ability to communicate their ideas/content. Freedman (n.d.) suggests allowing students to complete rough drafts for peer review, or show you in office hours. You can also encourage students to access the Writing Assistance Services provided by SASC.

May have inconsistent knowledge of US writing conventions

Many students may have inconsistent knowledge of US writing conventions, especially regarding citation and plagiarism. Some may be unfamiliar with the concept of “ownership” in Western writing, or may have learned English by memorizing or repeating texts. They may also have been taught rhetorical conventions and/or methods of organization that differ from standard academic writing in the US.

Establish clear guidelines for plagiarism in your syllabus, and discuss this with your students. Also, consider the intentionality behind suspected plagiarism, and how your response can help the student learn from the mistake. For more suggestions, see the Office of Student Support and Judicial Affairs, as well as our “Addressing Plagiarism Series.”
